Public policymaking is the combination of basic decisions, commitments, and action made by those who hold or affect government positions. Typically, such initiatives direct the flow of resources that impact public. In a democracy most public policy makers are elected officials. Societal expectations may go a long way toward providing a general framework of what public policymakers may or may not do, but the specific roles of policymakers are hardly set in stone. Those roles change as the standards and expectations of society change. Many of major public policy issues of today, from homelessness and domestic violence to environmental pollution and energy, were considered beyond the responsibilities of government two centuries ago. Moreover, it was not imagined the impact of technological innovation as nuclear power, cloning, or fiber optic communication networks, which have generated public policy issues in today's world. But as social, economic, and technological changes take place, so do the demands upon the policymakers and policymaking process. Public policymaking can also be daunting because, as part of their responsibility, policymakers may give benefits to some and place burdens on others. Nevertheless, whatever may be the public issues, policymakers have to follow the prescribed basic constitutional guarantees, rights, and obligations.
